Heavent: Industrial Exhaust Ventilation Design Software — Updated

Steven E. Guffey

Publication #9905 $495

Now Available in Windows® on CD-ROM

Designs new systems using ACGIH®'s Industrial Ventilation Manual's method with some optional improvements (e.g., bilateral junctions, more robust plenum system design, very fast damper adjustment method). Troubleshoots installed systems, allowing simple input and analysis of static pressure and Pitot traverse data — including graphs of velocity contours and real-time comparison to previous values of troubleshooting parameter values. Redesigns existing systems using data measured from the current system. User Interface: Menus similar to Windows® software. User Input: Can change previous inputs or the layout at any time; move the cursor to the desired component on the schematic to input or change information about that component; input routine has extensive error-checking; user-settable defaults minimize input time and allow sweeping changes at a keystroke; allows switching between inch-pound and metric units at will. System Layout: Program builds and displays a simple schematic of the system with minimal user inputs; allows up to 330 branches and 10 air-cleaners with no limit to subsystems; no arcane “naming” conventions; allows a 50-character description of each duct. Capabilities: tapered or plenum systems; allows use of bilateral junctions; automatic recalculation of pressures and flows; painless psychrometrics; duct-sizing for round, flat-oval, rectangular; recommends round diameters from user-tailored lists; balances junctions by "correcting airflow," resizing diameters, or dampers; computes SPs for measurable locations; fan-system effects simplified. Output: Print to file or paper; succinct tables of inputted and calculated values; limited list of materials (elbows and duct lengths); information allowing fast damper adjustments and future troubleshooting. Requirements: Any IBM-compatible with 580K available DOS-RAM and hard drive (2 MB consumed by program). User's name required. © 2004.
